BOCA RATON, Fla. -- Members of the local Muslim community are glad to know that Osama bin Laden was killed. Robert Rabil, a political professor at Florida Atlantic University in Boca Raton, called bin Laden a burden to some Muslims, and now that burden has been lifted. "They are worried about being associated with terrorism," said Rabil. "We are Muslim, but we are not terrorists, and Osama bin Laden, what he did, he did not do in the name of all Muslims. He did not do it in the name of Islam. It is his version of Islam. It is not our version of it, Islam, so yes, of course, it's a big sigh of relief."

The feeling was much the same in the local Muslim community. But some are still concerned about the future. "Yes, bin Laden is the head of al-Qaida, but the school of al-Qaida is still alive, and there are a lot of people like bin Laden who will come again and kill people for religious situation," said Mohamad Al-Halabi, Iman at the American Islamic Center of Florida.
